A further sub-distinction is also required, I suggest, between research which is scientific and that which is practical in orientation. Both forms of research have the exclusive immediate goal of producing knowledge, but they vary in the relative weight, and particular formulation, they give to the two criteria in terms of which the conclusions of research are properly assessed: validity and relevance. Scientific research, while being concerned to produce knowledge which has human relevance, places primary emphasis on the likely validity of the knowledge generated. The Doctor's Baby Dare.
